GENERAL GARFIELD'S VICTORY OVER MARSHALL.

The following letter, although three weeks old, having been strangely delayed in its transmission, contains a graphic and interesting account of the rout of Marshall's forces, and gives a more minute description of the fight than we have heretofore seen :

[Correspondence of the Louisville Journal.] Camp at Paintsville, Ky.. Jan. 13.

Gen. Garfield, who has been making Marshall retire rapidly before him to this part of the country, was brought to a stand still a few days after Christmas by finding that the fat rebel had so snugly entrenched himself within a few miles of here that it would require as large a torce as he could muster to drive him from it; torce as he could muster to drive him from it; so he immediately summoned all who were under his command to join him at this place, and among others he called on Col. Lindsey, whe, of course, although not yet mustered into the U.S. service, or brigaded under Garfield, responded cheerfully to the call, and our regiment by necessarily slow and tedious routes made its way as far as Louisa, Lawrence county, where the news reached us that Marshall had burned his baggage and retreated under cover of darkness, leaving a clear field, and showing but the smallest sign of a fight.

We were compelled to travel in detachments, as there are few boats on Big Sandy, and they are all small, and as the order calling us to aid him had not been countermand-ing us to aid him had not been countermanded by Gen. Garfield we continued our march up. Lieut. Col. Monroe was first sent forward with a detachment of four companies and the remainder of the regiment was to go by land. Monroe and his command reached this place on Wednesday, the 8th January, and were immediately ordered to draw rations for three hold themselves in readiness to march. Early on the morning of the 9th, with detachments from the 42d Ohio, 14th and 22d Kentucky regiments of infantry, and a suadron of Wolford's cavalry, amounting in all to about 1,100 men, Gen. Garfield started on the march to Prestonsburg in pursuit of the flering Marshall. on the march to Protecting Marshall.

They marched cautiously but rapidly during they have been according to the first day, passing on the route by Marshall's intrenchments, which certainly offered the best defence for him that could wel be planned. For a mile before you reached the place by the principal road there were breastworks thrown up in the style of abettis, behind which a hundred men could conceal themselves and fire on an unsuspecting foe, making a safe retreat through narrow ravines in the rear. The principal fortification was a fort built on the side of a hill, where cannon and five thousand men could be sheltered, and which commanded three roads forking there, besides a considerable stream called Jenny's creek. Tremendous hills towered above and creek. Tremendous hills towered above and all round it, where the rebels could have posted flankers to harass the attacking party, and, taken all in all, it is said by military men to be the most complete natural fortification and most impregnable they ever saw.

After passing this place for a mile or two everything gave indication that they were fast coming into what might be called an enemy's country. An advance quark of cavaler were country. An advance guard of cavalry was kept continually shead scouring the country to prevent a surprise, and the day's march was ended about 8 o clock with nothing of stirring interest to relate. The men were tired, and as soon as they fell upon the earth with their blankets around them they were fast locked in the arms of "sweet nature" blest restorer." in the arms of " sweet nature's blest restorer." An alarm from the pickets early in the morn-ing, before daybreak, hardly sufficed to rouse ing, befere daybreak, hardly sufficed to rouse them from their slumbers, and they returned again to sleep when they found it had only been a skirmish between a scouting party of the enemy and our pickets, which left the rebels the necessity of carrying off one of their number saverely wounded. On the march nagain they passed through Prestonburg, and here were informed that the enemy was about five miles ahead. Tired and jaded as they were, the expectation of having a fight reinvigorated them, and they moved on with renewed alacrity. newed alacrity.

About one o'clock p. m., in the vicinity of a stream called Middle Creek, they heard the sharp rattle of musketry in the direction of their advanced scouts. They halted, and the Adjutant of the 42d Ohio was sent with a squad of men over the creek to the point of a hill to discover the cause of the firing. As he reached the hill, our men heard the loud boom of cannon, and then they knew that there was I ordinary skirmishing to be done there. The Adjutant returned and reported the enemy in force on the opposite side of the hill, and they soon began to appear on the peaks of the tall soon negan to appear on the peaks of the tall hills, and commenced firing on our mon. Gen. Garfield immediately divided his force into three detachments, leaving one as a reserve, giving one in command of Lieut. Colonel Monroe, and the other to Col. Craner, of the 40th Ohio Volunteers, and ordered the latter to attempt the ascent of one of the peaks to the right. In his detachment was a portion of the Washington Rifles, commanded by Louis Schweltser, of your city, and they behaved to a man most callantly.

Schweitzer, of your city, and they behaved to a man most gallantly.

Graner's detachment won their way inch by inch up the steep hill without the loss of a man, and killing several of the enemy, and drove them gradually down the other side, and from the top of the hill obtained a full view of the cannen. Opposite them, and on a hill to the left of a cannon, which was planted in the ravine, the rebels were intreached behind a large rock which seemed impregnable from below. rock which seemed impregnable from below. Craner's detachment divided their fire between the artillerists below and the infantry above. For some time they were in a most dangerous position, being exposed to the entire fire of the enemy from the two peaks which they yet occupied, and from the fire of the cannon in the revine. ravine. Gen. Garfield, seeing the state of the case, ordered Lieut. Colonel Monroe, of the 22d Kentucky, to storm the rock on the hill with his command. And here commenced one of the most desperate and determined fights that this war has yet given birth to. They crossed the creek, which was up to their waists, smid s hot fire from the enemy, who doubtless divined their intention.

When on dry land again, they started up the hill with shouts, led on by Monroe and reached a flat on the side of the hill, where they were assailed by three fires from different points, as another force was discovered on a hill to the left who poured a warm fire into them. Here, too, an unfortunate mistake occurred, which came near losing the battle to us. Craner's men on the hill to the right, mistaking Monroe's men for rebels, poured a fire into them from their side, so that he was now exposed to four fires from four different points. The laft who poured a warm fire into them. four fires from four different points. blunder was soon rectified, however, by Col. Garfield, from the stand where he was observing the fight, calling out to Craner that he was firing into our own men, and Monroe's detach-ment raising a shout of "Hurrah for the Union," which was instantly understood by Craner's men, and responded to by them with

The rebels raised a loud shout of "Hurrah for Jeff Davis," and sent a thicker volley of balls than ever, wounding one of our men badly in the arm. Our men now bushwacked it; that is, sheltered themselves behind trees and shot when they had a bead drawn on their man. Within a few yards of the rock, Monroe ordered them to charge bayonets, and with loud yells for the Union they sprang up the hill and over the rocks. Three of our men leaped upon the the rocks. Three of our men seaped upon the rock, and two of them fell—the ene dead with a ball through his brain, and the other with a bad wound in his leg. Thickly the shot fell around them from the other two peaks, but the secessionists in the immediate vicinity of the rock turned and fled indiscriminately. The rock turned and fied indiscriminately. The rock was won by as gallant a charge as has been recorded. The fight lasted about an hour longer, the attention of our men being mainly directed to their cannon, which was doing us small damage, although several times they fired bombshells out of it at our troops on the hillside. The firing became slack, and, as the cover of darkness came over thoseene, it cessed

"Leaning over the counter a puzzled volunteer was endeavoring to reckon up the change just paid out by the sleek-haired clerk. Before him lay a quantity of mutilated bills, ragged and dirty pieces of paper, bits of card-board, printed checks, a few copper pennies, milktickets, postage-stamps, and other interesting specimens of the present outrageous 'coin of the realm.' Over and over again the puzzled volunteer essayed to count the pile of villainous currency, and over and over again he failed to find it satisfactory. It was too much for his rustic arithmetic; the problem was too difficult to solve upon only ten fingers. The bystanders

ter had gone raving mad in different kinds of type, 'Good for one shave; (reading slowly) Dick, the barber—' 'Do you call this money'

The sleek haired clerk was puzzled also. 'It'll pass all over town; indeed it will, sir.' Once more the soldier scrutinized the ragged and incongruous pile, and grasping it in one hand, soliloquized: 'So this is money—money? ha! I call it stuff. Why a man might hold his hand full, and then have but 37 cents in money.'"
